The Japanese-American population of the West Coast has been removed to camp areas in the interior of the United States. This is a temporary measure to prevent any possibility of sabotage or interference by the enemy. The camps are designed to provide a safe and secure environment for the displaced individuals.

The internment camps are managed by the War Relocation Authority, a federal agency created for this purpose. The camps are located in isolated areas, far from urban centers, and are equipped with basic amenities such as housing, medical care, and recreational facilities.

The internment camps operate under strict security measures to prevent any unauthorized entry or exit. All individuals are required to carry identification at all times and are subject to random searches. The camps are designed to ensure the safety and security of the residents.

The internment camps are a contentious issue, with some arguing that they are a necessary measure to protect national security and others calling them an abuse of constitutional rights. The debate continues as the camps remain a part of American history.
